Surgery is a crucial field of work with ethics playing a prominent role in this profession simply because patients lay the most valuable gems they own, i.e. their lives, in the hands of the surgeon and seek their health.

A surgeon is intellectual, knowledgeable, expert, responsible, and artistic with a profound understanding of the history of civilization and the lives of humankind. At the same time, a surgeon lives in contemporary times and subscribes to scientific achievements. It is love of life, science, art, and most important of all, human existence and health which engages surgeons in their profession.

A surgeon is not an indifferent individual and his/her approach to disease is one based on cognition and love. It is this very love which serves as an inspiration for continuing the laborious profession of surgery. A surgeon's relation with a patient is founded upon humaneness and cognizance. More than being a profession, surgery is satisfying one's soul and seeking to alleviate the pains of suffering individuals.

Surgery is a mission requiring philanthropy prior to technical knowledge; it needs conscientiousness and modesty rather than fame: nobility instead of acquisition of profit, patience and tolerance with patients and not vanity and pride. Income generation must not be the basis of activity in this field; rather one has to dedicate oneself to the cause. Surgery calls for modesty and generosity while the tendency for fame and stardom is detrimental to it since both humaneness and the patient would gradually lose their priority in the surgeon's mind and s/he would only be after performing more and more surgeries. And to this end, chances are that a surgeon might engage in surgery where not required and juxtapose lives with pain and risk.

A surgeon is primarily a pious trustee being granted the life, body parts, tissues, and all that belongs to a patient. Thus s/he acts in utmost respect and away from the temptation of further and more extended surgery. The surgeon is extremely cautious when it comes to putting to trial the methods which have demonstrated their being in vain in the process of time. S/he leaves clinical testing to academic centers and resorts only to relatively approved procedures of surgery through his/her own personal innovation and skills in the best possible fashion.

Surgeons are specialists who employ all the state-of-the-art facilities in their work. They are interpreters and critics of the science of surgery and have the discretion to choose the most efficient diagnostic and therapeutic processes from the endless ocean of knowledge and information.

A surgeon is a creative artist and his/her healing hands in complete harmony with his/her sufficient knowledge and brain can correct the deficiencies of body parts and remove the factors intervening with the health of a patient.

A love for the ailing can be felt in the depths of the grand soul and heart of the surgeon for a surgeon is a sensitive person.

A surgeon's joy and grief is interconnected with his/her patients' improving or deteriorating health. Indeed, they live with their patients. As every patient recovers, their souls expand and with the departure of a patient, a part of them too deceases.
